What in the traditional formulation of the national purpose must we remember, and what must we forget, if we want to do justice to the purpose of America in the contemporary world? The possible objectives of that consensus range from the general character of society and government, its personnel and procedures, to the concrete objectives of policy; typically, the consensus emerges out of a struggle between antagonistic and frequently incompatible concep- tions of what the consensus should be. But, for that end, America herself must guarantee that she will never become as so many of your ministerial writers have preached an image of The Instruments and Institutions of American Purpose Europe, a mass of divided powers disputing about territories or the profits of commerce, and continually cementing the slavery of peoples by their own blood.
