In the uncertain hour before the morning
Near the ending of interminable night
At the recurrent end of the unending
After the dark dove with the flickering tongue
Had passed below the horizon of his homing
While the dead leaves still rattled on like tin
Over the asphalt where no other sound was Between three districts whence the smoke arose
I met one walking, loitering and hurried
As if blown towards me like the metal leaves
Before the urban dawn wind
Redeeming Time: T.S. Eliot's Four Quartets.
The dove descending breaks the air
With flame of incandescent terror
Of which the tongues declare
The one discharge from sin and error.

The whole composition of Four Quartets – its architectonics – is built, as I tried to show, according to the principle of investigation, that is, of seeking the truth: each movement reveals its tensions and contradictions of being and the last movement of each quartet is usually a denouement, while the first movement of the next quartet denies or develops the previous one and reveals new contradictions.
